Adelaide

Adelaide is a new city in an old land. Founded as a British colony in 1836, and now the capital of South Australia. Today, its rich mix of diverse cultures lives together in a relaxed and cosmopolitan lifestyle. Not only is Adelaide full of green parks but it has 30km of beaches stretching along its suburbs. The city is famous for its al fresco eating culture and is the centre of the Australian wine industry, with some of the best food and drink in the world.

THE CITY

When Governor John Hindmarsh arrived to found a British colony in 1836, the Adelaide Plains had been home to the Kaurna Aboriginal people for many thousands of years. The city that arose on the plains has developed into one of the most culturally diverse in the world.

The centre, which lies near the Torrens River rather than the coast, is a grid of wide graceful streets encircled by a ring of parks. This gives Adelaide an open, green aspect, which, coupled with the blue skies of the warm South Australian climate, make for a beautiful city.

The colonists came ashore at Port Adelaide, whose 19th-century centre is still intact and gives the visitor a feel of the early days of the colony. Adelaide soon spread out to the seashore, and now has a long line of relaxing beach suburbs easily accessible by trams that run from the city centre.

The arrival of successive waves of immigrants - from Germans and Italians to Lebanese and Japanese - have given the city an enviable reputation for good food and drink, with some of the most diverse eating opportunities of any city in the world. The winemaking brought by German immigrants has turned Adelaide into one of the world's great wine producing centres.

SHOPPING

There are two main hearts to the Adelaide shopping experience. The first is in the northeast of the central grid of streets where Rundle Mall - Adelaide's first shopping mall built in the mid-1970s - offers all the usual high-end chains you find across Australia. Running off Rundle Mall down to Grenfell Street, are the heritage-listed Adelaide Arcade and the Regent Arcade, which offer boutique shopping, aboriginal crafts and even locally mined opals.

The second main centre is to the southwest of the central grid of streets, between Grote and Gouger Streets, where you will find the Adelaide Central Market, known as the food pantry of Adelaide. Here, you will discover a dazzling array of foods, showing the wonderful abundance of raw ingredients that Australia produces. This area is also a showcase of the melting pot of cultures that make up Adelaide today, with the sights and smells of Italian, Vietnamese, Lebanese, Greek, Chinese and Japanese cuisines to feast upon, to name but a few.
